

Problem Statement: Students at UofSC have been struggling to attend online classes, as meeting times are not as straightforward as a physical schedule would be. For example, Zoom does not include any notification system to remind students when meetings will begin, as students are forced to memorize codes and passwords each session, rather than entering them once and being able to press a button to instantly join a Zoom meeting again, making a schedule impossible. Meetings are also spread out over a multitude of different programs including Blackboard, Zoom, and even Discord. It starts to become difficult for a student to remember where his or her class will be taking place. This is important because students need to be aware of when and on which platform their class will take place. Without a system like this, students are left missing classes, hindering their education.
